Read the Reading Lab text again. Answer in full sentences.

Last September, Hamad's school asked him to speak at the National Day assembly. He was proud, but he was also terrified. He practiced his speech forty times in front of the mirror and twice in front of his cat.

On the morning of the assembly, one day before the holiday, the whole city was already green. There were flags on the cars, flags on the balconies, and green lights on the tallest towers. Hamad's heart beat fast when he walked onto the stage. The microphone made a loud noise, and everyone laughed. He was embarrassed for one second. Then he smiled, and the fear went away.

His speech was about his grandfather. His grandfather moved to Riyadh when it was a much smaller city with only a few tall buildings. "My grandfather was surprised by every new building," Hamad said. "Today, I am surprised by nothing. But I am grateful for everything."

When he finished, the hall was silent for a moment. Then the clapping started. His teacher was thrilled, and his mother cried a little. Hamad felt relieved and calm, like after a long race. On National Day, the fireworks were green, and so was his heart.

1 How many times did Hamad practice his speech?

2 What was his speech about?

3 Why did the laughing help Hamad instead of hurting him?

4 When were you last nervous and then relieved? Tell the story.
